Update on the Lamothe Campaign

By Jon

Another hurdle for the Lamothe campaign as an allegation that Mr. Chris Lamothe used campaign funds to purchase at eat the world's largest lobster roll rocks the presidential campaign. Campaign manager, Seth Cohen, stated early this morning: "These allegations are exactly that, allegations which Mr. Lamothe denies wholeheartedly". While making this statement the presidential hopeful Chris was seen behind Mr. Cohen covered in mayo, lemon and butter sauce. His opponents have stated that they don't see the supply manager as a legitimate political threat even with his rising poll numbers. "Ask them that again when they need a bunch of scissors and markers and see if they get any" replied Mr. Lamothe. The history of presidential seafood scandals has deep roots in American politics, In 1808 when presidential candidate Charles Pinckney was found to have taken a bribe to spend on two 60 lb. crabcakes and in 1920 when Warren G. Harding was found to be sneaking on to a train with 200 filets of cod late at night which he claimed to be a gift from a friend. While Mr. Lamothe's alleged purchase of a 600 lb. lobster roll stands out as by far the largest presidential candidate seafood hijinks, it seems to have done nothing to the poll numbers of the candidate, which have only been going up as of recent due to the success of the YEAT plan. His supporters are quoted as saying, "I don't care what he does with that there bunch of lobster, all I know is I think he's gonna be the best president ever." And "so he eats lobster all I know is he is a candidate I feel like I can have a S'more with" We here at the Sci-Tech Times would like to take a moment to endorse the Lamothe campaign entirely, GO GET E'M CHRIS!
